We compared prices for a list of products a car owner is likely to need. These included items for basic maintenance oil, antifreeze, batteries, wiper blades, and the like as well as major repair components â€" alternators, clutch sets, fuel pump modules, oxygen sensors, and more. Factors such as loyalty or rewards programs, as well as shipping, pickup, and return policies, were also taken into account. What we discovered is that there's no clear all-around best choice. Based on price alone, O'Reilly Auto Parts looks like the top choice for the consumer looking to shop for everything on our list, with Advance Auto Parts bringing up the rear as the most expensive. But a closer look paints a much more complicated picture. We found lots of variations to compare up and down the line â€" and some of those variations are pretty significant, especially when it comes to replacement parts. Bottom line: You have to buy from more than one automotive retailer if you want the best price on every item, every time. But, if you're in the market for vehicle maintenance parts â€" such as windshield wiper blades or a new battery â€" rather than replacement parts, Napa Auto Parts nips the competition most of the time. Prices from retail locations in upstate New York; expect some variation in other markets, and between franchise locations. As our hypothetical vehicle, we selected a Honda Civic EX sedan, one of the most common cars on the road prices may vary for another make or model. Our shopping list contained 20 stock items an owner may need to maintain such a vehicle driven under average circumstances. In most cases, prices were within a few dollars of each other across retailers. Two automotive repair items on our shopping list had the biggest impact on the total cost: a fuel pump and a replacement clutch. Just keep in mind that all vehicle fuel pumps may not be created equal. We priced out the cheapest pumps that meet California automotive emission standards which are stricter than federal. And while AutoZone can't compete on best price, it's possible that its model might trump others on top performance. But for general-maintenance items wiper blades, oil, antifreeze, batteries, etc. We noticed some seemingly arbitrary differences in price when the same exact product was in stock in all or most of the stores. This was true for headlight bulbs, motor oil, cylinder heads, spark plugs, a code reader, and oxygen sensors. Price isn't the only important factor in choosing an auto parts store. Convenience plays a big role. The other three retailers we surveyed offer free shipping on online orders above a certain amount. AutoZone even ships online orders overnight although not all items and ZIP codes qualify for next-day shipping. With the others, free delivery is limited to standard ground shipping. All the chains have policies that offer free shipping for items ordered online for pickup at a bricks-and-mortar store, so shop location may wind up being the deciding factor in choosing a retailer. With over 6, locations in the United States alone, Napa Auto Parts is most likely to have a shop near you. Second is AutoZone, with about 5, stores nationwide. Keep in mind that many retailers do not ship antifreeze or batteries, because they contain hazardous materials. These items must be picked up at a local store. Mistakes happen, and retailers' return policies range from fairly liberal to pretty restrictive. Napa Auto Parts is the most accommodating shop, allowing online buyers to return unopened or defective products within 30 days without incurring additional shipping charges. Parts purchased online can also be returned to participating Napa Auto Parts locations. Other retailers also accept online returns at their stores, but consumers are on the hook for return-shipping costs unless there's a problem with the product or a mistake on the retailer's end. For return policies, O'Reilly Auto Parts has the most generous window: There is no time limit for returning new, unopened items. AutoZone imposes a day time limit on returns, and Advance Auto Parts sets a deadline of 45 days. From our shopping list, that includes fuel pumps and oxygen O2 sensors. Some stock items that are recyclable or can be rebuilt carry what's known as a "core charge," a deposit to ensure that a consumer returns the old part when it's time for a replacement. Two items on our list, alternators and batteries, along with brake shoes and water pumps, are among the items that carry this charge. Core prices can vary widely and sometimes be quite substantial. Whether the amount is large or small, you'll definitely want to recoup that sum â€" and, of course, do your part to help the environment. In most cases, a consumer has to return the used core to a retail store to avoid paying a shipping charge. Napa is the exception, allowing online customers who purchase a replacement to ship the old part free of charge, as long as they use box the replacement component came in and mail it back within 30 days of receiving the new one. Each retailers' rewards program policies vary. O'Reilly's O'Rewards applies only to in-store sales. Each retailer also provides bonuses to rewards program members, like exclusive discount coupons and invitations to special shop events, for example. Check their websites for details on reward redemption and exclusions, as well as additional perks. If you're looking for the most generous price-matching policy, Advance Auto Parts is probably your best bet. The company's guarantee claims Advance "will match the price of any identical or comparable product available the same day at any competitor's store or website. Napa Auto Parts and AutoZone do not have explicit price-matching policies on their websites' support pages, and consumer feedback indicates that experiences in stores can vary. AutoZone : Out of reviews submitted in the last year, two-thirds gave the auto parts retailer four or five stars, for an aggregate average of almost 4 stars. With 1-star reviews, complaints tend to center on unreliable shipping methods, with online customers receiving parts for their cars much later than expected. The gripes addressed in negative reviews vary widely: some ding Advance for poorly stocked and poorly run stores, while others point to issues with the websiteâ€"from basic functionality to receiving incorrect parts. More than a few reviews complain of warranties that were not honored. But just under two-thirds of the posted reviews award the retailer 4 or 5 stars, for an average of about 3. Again, top reviews credit knowledgeable employees willing to put extra time and effort into consultations regarding parts or repairs. It can pay to compare prices at other stores, especially for non-vehicle-specific parts and gear. Other stores to check:. Cheapism may earn a commission if you buy through a link on our site.
